Have you considered relocating from the city?

There are many reasons practitioners choose to move from a city to a county to work in a healthcare facility:

1. Lower Cost of Living: Counties often have a lower living cost than cities, allowing practitioners to enjoy a better quality of life.
2. High Service Demand: There tend to be fewer healthcare practitioners in rural areas, offering more opportunities for career advancement and establishing a robust patient base quickly.
3. Community Impact: Practitioners in rural areas can significantly impact the community, often building closer relationships with patients and families.
4. Lifestyle Preferences: Some people prefer the quieter, more relaxed countryside lifestyle compared to the hustle and bustle of city life.
5. Financial Incentives: Some counties offer financial incentives, such as loan repayment programs, higher salaries, or signing bonuses, to attract healthcare professionals.
6. Work-Life Balance: Rural healthcare facilities offer a better work-life balance with more predictable schedules—closed weekends.
7. Professional Fulfilment: Serving in an area with limited healthcare access can be professionally fulfilling, offering a sense of making a difference where it's most needed. These factors can make county positions attractive despite the potential challenges compared to urban settings.
